In the midst of overwhelming emotions, Winry finds herself grappling with a sense of emptiness and self-doubt after a series of setbacks at work. The chapter opens with her waking to a profound melancholy, the weight of failures pressing heavily on her heart. Despite the beautiful post-rain scene outside, she trudges through her morning routine with reluctance. Garfiel, a mentor figure, recognizes her dispiritedness and sends her on an errand to Mr. Dominic's place, urging her to take a break from the studio.

As Winry embarks on her journey up the mountain to collect steel for Garfiel, she reflects on her recent failures, especially her mishaps with a client named Darish, who felt overlooked when she was too focused on learning new techniques. Reaching Dominic's home, she sees the joy of a family that she had helped during a previous storm. However, her mood shifts as she enters the oppressive heat of Dominic's forge. The interaction becomes a catalyst for her to clarify what truly matters to her: not only mastering her skills but also being there for her clients on a personal level.

As dusk falls, Winry returns to the shop only to learn from Garfiel that Darish may have gotten into trouble with some unscrupulous individuals. Meanwhile, Alphonse reflects on the state alchemists and the complexities tied to their reputation as they eat breakfast.
