Chapter 1 Summary: One

In the opening chapter of "Pumpkin" by Julie Murphy, we meet Waylon, a fat gay high school student navigating life in the small town of Clover City, Texas. He shares his survival strategy: befriending adults, particularly the school nurse, Ms. Laverne. This friendship seems to offer him a protective shield against the bullying and toxic masculinity rampant in his school environment. He highlights the absurdity of being forced to participate in physical education class where shirts and skins are required and laments how his body doesn't fit the expected mold.

As Waylon enters the nurse's office, he stumbles upon Tucker Watson, a boy he's known since childhood, shirtless and tending to a minor injury. Waylon's immediate reaction is a mix of embarrassment and internal turmoil—he feels attracted to Tucker but is acutely aware of his own insecurities and the social dynamics at play. Tucker represents a past where they were once friends, but now their interactions are awkward, emphasizing Waylon's feelings of being an outsider.

Despite his anxiety, Waylon manages to remain composed while he waits for Ms. Laverne to finish with Tucker. This moment illustrates his self-deprecating humor and how he deals with his social discomfort. Waylon admires Ms. Laverne not just for her care but also for her fashion sense and warmth, showing how important supportive figures are in his life.

The chapter begins with Waylon arriving home just before a marathon of his favorite drag show, illuminating his supportive yet chaotic familial environment. His sister, Clementine, and her friend Hannah seem preoccupied with teenage antics, highlighting typical youthful flirtations.

As they settle in to watch the show, Waylon reflects deeply on the challenges faced by his favorite contestant, Mimi, who grapples with societal perceptions of body image and talent—issues that resonate with Waylon himself. He relates to Mimi's struggle, especially feeling the weight of being both fat and gay in a world that often makes acceptance conditional. Hannah's connection to the show through her fond memories of a previous winner gives Waylon a bittersweet sense of camaraderie, yet he wrestles with insecurity, feeling an internal pressure to justify his existence, separate from his appearance or identity.

Amidst this, Waylon receives a text from Lucas, his charming yet closeted crush with whom he shares an unclear romantic relationship. Their encounters range from playful make-out sessions in the gas station where Lucas works to a more complicated emotional connection that Waylon

His intense emotional reaction underscores the theme of unrequited love and the pain of unspoken expectations.

Waylon ultimately walks away from the encounter, his heart heavy with hurt and rejection. This twist sends Hannah into a frustrated and contemplative state, embodying a mix of sarcasm and resilience as she engages with Waylon about their circumstances. The narrative kicks off in the principal's office, where Hannah sits slouched, clearly unbothered by the ruckus about their nominations, which she suspects are a result of mockery orchestrated by their peers led by Patrick Thomas.

In Chapter 22 of "Pumpkin" by Julie Murphy, the group of friends finds themselves unwittingly volunteering at a church, sparking a lively discussion about their circumstances. This emotional moment reveals Hannah's vulnerability and the struggle many LGBTQ+ individuals face in their formative years, emphasizing themes of acceptance and the search for community.

As the group sits on the chapel steps sharing pizza, Hannah explains how, after being kicked out, she found refuge with her neighbors, Rich and Sheila, who offered her support instead of attempting to "fix" her. The scene is heart-wrenching yet uplifting, further emphasizing the theme of connection and the support systems that help individuals navigate their identities.

As Willowdean gives Tucker a ride, they engage in a heartfelt conversation where Williamson confronts past awkwardness and the reality of their present connection. Tucker's reluctance to associate with his old football buddies is revealed to stem from his discomfort rather than embarrassment about Willowdean, highlighting the complex layers of teen identity.

Upon arriving at Tucker's home, they encounter his father, Mr. Watson, whose apparent alcoholism casts a shadow over their interaction. While Mr. Watson is dismissive, Willowdean's genuine compliment about Tucker's potential introduces an intimate moment of understanding between them. It becomes clear that the relationship between Tucker and his father is fraught with both care and burden, adding depth to Tucker's character.

The chapter eloquently mixes humor and heavier themes, presenting a vivid picture of young friendship amid struggles for acceptance and the
