Chapter 1 Summary: : No One Left

In the first chapter of "The Secret Garden," we meet Mary Lennox, a lonely and neglected little girl born to parents who are more interested in their own lives than in her. Her father, a British government worker in India, is distant, while her beautiful mother cares only about social gatherings. Mary is raised by an Ayah, who, to prevent her from disturbing her mother, indulges Mary's every whim. As a result, Mary grows up spoiled and selfish, often displaying a sour demeanor and lacking any real connections with people aside from the servants.

One fateful day, at the age of nine, Mary is awakened by a servant and learns that her Ayah cannot come to her. Confused and abandoned, she ventures outside to play, overhearing a conversation between her mother and an army officer. They speak in hushed voices about a cholera outbreak, which unnerves Mary. The officer reveals that it's dire, and abruptly, Mary hears a commotion from the servants' quarters—they've all begun to flee in panic.

After two lonely days in the nursery, which she spent crying and sleeping, Mary finally ventures out for some food. She consumes biscuits and drinks a tonic that makes her drowsy, leading her to fall into a deep sleep. Upon awakening, she finds the house eerily silent. Curiously, she notices a harmless snake slithering across the floor, representing her isolation in this vast, quiet home. Soon after, heavy footsteps approach, and an army officer enters to inform her of a tragic reality: her parents and most of the staff have died from the cholera outbreak. With haunting simplicity, the officer tells her, “There’s nobody left to come.”

This revelation marks a pivotal moment for Mary, as she discovers her profound solitude. The chapter effectively sets the tone for her journey of transformation, introducing themes of neglect, abandonment, and the potential for change that will unfold in the following chapters. Mary's initial character—a spoiled, isolated child—foreshadows the challenges she will need to confront and transcend as her story progresses.

Chapter 2 Summary: : On the Moors

In Chapter 2 of "The Secret Garden," we follow Mary Lennox as her life takes a dramatic turn. After being taken from India, Mary arrives in England to live with her guardian, Mr. Archibald Craven, at Misselthwaite Manor. She meets Mrs. Medlock, the housekeeper, who reveals some details about her new home. Mary learns that Misselthwaite Manor is an old, grand house full of locked rooms, and it is surrounded by the vast, desolate moors. Mrs. Medlock describes Mr. Craven as a troubled man who rarely interacts with others and prefers to isolate himself, especially after the death of his wife, Mary's aunt.

During their train journey to the manor, Mary presents a disinterested demeanor, feigning boredom to mask her anxiety and discomfort. However, she begins to understand the melancholic atmosphere that surrounds her new life. When they arrive at the manor, Mary is struck by its size and gloominess, feeling small and lost amidst the grand, shadowy halls adorned with portraits and armor.

Even before settling in, Mary's sense of loneliness is palpable, worsened by Mrs. Medlock's stern instructions to avoid exploring the house. After a long journey, Mary feels miserable and isolated, knowing she has little connection to anyone in this unfamiliar place.

Chapter 3: : A Maid Named Martha

In Chapter 3 of "The Secret Garden," Mary Lennox wakes up to the sound of a maid, Martha, tidying up the fireplace. As Mary surveys her new surroundings in Misselthwaite Manor, she finds the room gloomy and the view from the window uninviting—a barren moor that she detests. Martha, however, paints a vibrant picture of the moor, describing how it transforms in summer with wildflowers and the joyful sounds of nature, which puzzles Mary since she's used to a more reserved atmosphere in India.

Their conversation reveals more about Martha, a cheerful and talkative girl from Yorkshire who shares stories of her family and her brother Dickon, who has a special bond with animals. Mary is intrigued by Dickon and experiences a rare moment of interest in someone other than herself, hinting at her growing emotional depth.

Martha encourages Mary to go outside and play, asserting that staying indoors would be dull since the nursery offers no entertainment. Initially reluctant to brave the dreary weather, Mary is persuaded by Martha's stories

Chapter 4 Summary: : Gardens and a Gardener

In Chapter 4 of "The Secret Garden," Mary Lennox ventures through a little gate into a grand, yet desolate garden filled with wide lawns, winding paths, and a dry, old fountain. As she explores, she stumbles upon several walled gardens, initially believing they are quite unremarkable and ugly in the winter. Her exploration introduces her to a grumpy old gardener named Ben Weatherstaff, who seems less than pleased to see her but provides her with some information about the kitchen gardens.

Mary's curiosity drives her to discover a mysterious, locked garden, rumored to have been left untouched for ten years. While wandering, she encounters a cheerful robin, whose song lifts her spirits. This encounter sparks her interest in the locked garden, and she wonders about its history, especially why Mr. Craven, the owner, despises it.

Through a conversation with Ben, Mary reveals her feelings of loneliness, and they find common ground in their shared isolation. Ben describes the robin as a loyal friend who returned to him after a period of weakness, paralleling Mary's own need for companionship. Their interaction exposes Mary's vulnerability, and for the first time, she acknowledges her longing for connection, realizing she has never had a real friend.

Chapter 5 Summary: : A Cry in the House

In Chapter 5 of "The Secret Garden," Mary Lennox is gradually adjusting to her new life in her uncle's mansion, finding a sense of daily routine with Martha, the maid who brings her breakfast and helps her dress. Initially, Mary continues to be a bit disagreeable and picky with her food, but she soon awakens to a newfound hunger, crediting the fresh moor air for her growing appetite. Martha encourages her to embrace the outdoors, reminding her that play can be found in the simplest of things like sticks and stones, a concept quite foreign to Mary.

As Mary explores the gardens, she becomes intrigued by a long walkway overgrown with thick ivy. One day, she spots a lively robin perched on the wall. This encounter sparks a connection; Mary instinctively talks to the bird, and their playful interaction lifts her spirits. The robin seems to lead her deeper into her imaginative exploration, and Mary dreams of a secret garden.

Determined to find this hidden place, she searches the walls and the ground without success. During a cozy evening by the fireplace, Mary listens to Martha tell a poignant story about Mr. Craven, her uncle, and his late wife, who loved the garden. After a tragic accident involving his wife, Mr. Craven developed a deep-seated hatred for the garden, further shrouding it in mystery and sadness.

The chapter takes a dramatic turn when Mary hears a strange sound, resembling a child crying nearby. She insists that it is not the wind, as Martha suggests, and her growing sense of intuition tells her there's something more going on within the house. The atmosphere becomes tense as the wind howls outside, and during their conversation, the door suddenly slams open, amplifying the mystery. Mary's belief that someone, possibly a hidden child, is crying grows stronger, while Martha tries to dismiss it as the noise of the new kitchen maid.

This chapter effectively showcases Mary's transition from a lonely, spoiled child to a more curious and empathetic girl as she begins to explore the world around her and uncover the secrets of Misselthwaite Manor. The themes of exploration, the healing power of nature, and the complexity of grief weave through the narrative, setting the stage for Mary's growing connection to both the garden and the lives intertwined within it.

Chapter 6: : Opening Doors

In Chapter 6 of "The Secret Garden," the atmosphere is dreary as rain envelops the moor, leaving Mary stuck indoors. Curiosity about her new surroundings sparks a conversation with Martha, revealing the playful nature of her siblings, especially Dickon, who has a knack for caring for animals. Their exchange ignites Mary's longing for companionship, and her thoughts wander to the many closed doors in the mansion she's taken refuge in.

With a sense of determination, Mary decides to explore the house, intrigued by the mystery of its hundred rooms. As she wanders through hallways lined with portraits of elegantly dressed figures and magnificent decorations, she stumbles upon a room filled with beautiful ivory elephants, reminiscent of her life in India. For a moment, she indulges in her surroundings, playing with the tiny statues until she feels fatigue creep in.

However, her exploration takes a sudden turn when she hears a mysterious, childish cry that seems to call out for help. Her heart races, pushing her to find the source of the sound as she accidentally brushes against a tapestry,

Chapter 14 Summary: : Colin the Rajah

In Chapter 14 of "The Secret Garden," Mary Lennox discovers that the boy she heard crying the night before is Colin Craven, the invalid cousin she has yet to meet. When she tells Martha, Colin's nurse, about this encounter, Martha expresses worry that they could get in trouble if Mrs. Medlock, the housekeeper, finds out. Despite her fears, Mary reassures her that Colin was pleased with her visit. Through their conversation, we learn more about Colin's troubled past: he was born into grief after his mother died and has been kept in isolation due to concerns about his health. He is described as spoiled and overly protected, spending his days in bed rather than enjoying the fresh air.

When Mary is given the opportunity to visit Colin's room during the day, she is struck by its beauty and warmth. Colin, now sitting up, asserts his desires with a royal demeanor, insisting that everyone must cater to him. Mary reflects on this, comparing him to a rajah she once met in India, and describes Dickon, Martha's brother, who has a deep connection with nature. Colin expresses a longing to experience the moor, but he believes he is destined to die, a thought that Mary dislikes and challenges. She declares that if everyone believed she should die, she would fight against it—and they share a moment of laughter as they realize they are cousins.

Their playful exchange is interrupted by Mrs. Medlock and Dr. Craven,

When she bursts in, her frustration boils over, and instead of comforting him, she confronts Colin with a surprising fierceness. She tells him exactly what she thinks of his behavior, claiming that his screams won't get him anywhere and that everyone wishes he would just stop. Her boldness shocks Colin and, despite his panic, it manages to calm him somewhat as she challenges him by insisting he doesn't actually have a lump on his back as he fears.

Mary orders the nurse to examine Colin, who is visibly thin and frail. The nurse confirms there's no lump, just a weak back from lack of use. With this newfound knowledge, Colin begins to shift away from his previous self-pity—he begins to sound like a real boy, curious about life outside his room instead of a sickly rajah.
