Chapter 1 Summary:

On a sunny afternoon in May, the small town of Loon Lake, Wisconsin, buzzes with the energy of middle-school students flocking to Sweo's Gas & Groceries for snacks after school. In one corner of the store, three boys and a girl linger in the DVD aisle, eagerly waiting for their target. The tallest boy, Larry, counts down the moments until a man in his twenties enters. The man, dressed neatly, instantly catches the girl's eye, prompting an excited exchange as she recognizes him from an Instagram photo. However, the situation quickly escalates when Larry declares a "citizens' arrest," sending the man fleeing in surprise. As he drives away, one of the boys snaps a photo of his license plate, hinting at their determination to uncover the man's identity.

Meanwhile, at the Loon Lake police station, Chief Lewellyn Ferris is lost in thought about her potential candidacy for sheriff, represented by a vibrant bumper sticker on her desk. As she contemplates the changes this decision could bring in her life, Dispatch interrupts her with news of the commotion at Sweo's. Bud Tillman, the store manager, reports that the kids are convinced they've confronted a sexual predator. Recognizing one of the kids as Erin Amundson's daughter, Lew decides to handle the situation personally rather than sending an officer. With a mix of concern and duty, she invites Erin to accompany her, hinting at the possibility that her daughter could be caught in a serious incident.

Chapter 2 Summary:

In Chapter Two of "Wolf Hollow," we find four preteens—Larry, Denny, John, and Mason—huddled nervously in the store manager's office, awaiting a serious conversation with Lewellyn "Lew" Ferris, the local police chief. The scene is tense as Lew assesses the children, noting their anxious expressions and the dynamics between them, particularly how Mason's protective and somewhat overbearing friends rally around her. Mason, who is of mixed heritage, stands out among her peers for her striking looks, which contrast with her mother Erin's porcelain complexion. Erin is present as a concerned parent while managing her campaign for county sheriff.

As Lew navigates the conversation, she learns that the children were attempting to make a "citizens' arrest" of a man named Noah McDonough, whom they believe to be a sexual predator after he attempted to contact Mason through text, having found her online after she was featured in a news segment. John's uncomfortable assertion that he is the mastermind behind their plan reveals his anxious desire to protect his friend, while Larry's eagerness to contribute highlights the camaraderie among the kids. Mason, for her part, admits she had engaged with McDonough, showing both her vulnerability and the naivety of youth.

Lew, trying to remain calm amidst the escalating panic, realizes the gravity of the situation. She reassures the kids, stressing that they must rely on trained professionals for such situations and that they've acted out of concern, albeit misguidedly. The children's bravery is commendable but also underscores the themes of safeguarding innocence and the dangers lurking in their seemingly safe community.

After dismissing the kids, Lew turns her attention to Erin, who expresses her fears for her daughter and the challenges of parenting in today's world. There's a poignant moment of camaraderie as they discuss the need for an expert to educate the local children about safety, pointing to the broader theme of community responsibility to protect its young.

The chapter closes with Lew's light-hearted conversation with Bud, the store manager, bringing a moment of levity after a tense situation. They discuss a local dispute surrounding the renaming of Toad Lake, showcasing the small-town dynamics and the disagreements that can arise. Overall, this chapter vividly portrays the protective instincts of both children and adults in light of emerging threats, the complexities of growing up, and the nuanced interactions in their close-knit community.

Chapter 3:

In Chapter Three of "Wolf Hollow," Chief Lewellyn Ferris visits the McDonough property after gathering information about a troubling incident involving Noah McDonough. The chapter opens with Lew examining the county plat book, which reveals that the McDonough Trust owns prime land near Toad Lake, hinting at family wealth linked to timber barons of the past. As she approaches the McDonough residence, marked by old stone pillars, she comes across an abandoned white house, a stark contrast to the surrounding natural beauty.

Upon arriving at the modern McDonough home, she encounters Grace McDonough, Noah's mother, who displays a defensive demeanor when Lew identifies herself. Lew is there to arrest Noah for a serious charge—violating the Wisconsin Age of Consent Law and attempting to kidnap an underage girl. Grace's reaction is alarmingly dismissive; rather than expressing concern for the allegations, she immediately accuses Lew of overstepping her bounds, revealing an underlying arrogance anchored in their family's legacy.

Chapter 4 Summary:

In Chapter Four of "Wolf Hollow," tensions rise as Lew Ferris, the chief of police, deals with Grace McDonough, who arrives at the station demanding the release of her son, Noah. Grace's confrontational demeanor showcases her strong will, as she insists on taking Noah home immediately. Lew, unfazed, calmly explains that Noah is being held due to serious allegations involving inappropriate communication with a twelve-year-old girl, Mason Amundson. Despite Grace's aggressive bluster and attempts to downplay the situation, Lew's professionalism prevails as she waits for Noah to be brought in.

When Noah arrives, he appears more like a troubled teenager than a twenty-four-year-old. His interaction with Grace reveals a strained mother-son relationship; he clearly wants to distance himself from her. As they navigate the legal procedures, the tension underscores the emotional stakes of the situation.

Meanwhile, a meeting is convened with parents and children impacted by Noah's actions, where fear and outrage prompt heated discussions. Nancy Fortran, a passionate community member, expresses her concerns about the potential danger posed by Noah, demanding more rigorous investigation and involvement from the FBI. On the other hand, Stanley Mayer defends Grace, arguing that her wealth and status should lend her son some credibility, a notion that Lew swiftly challenges.

The meeting shifts as Erin Amundson introduces important initiatives aimed at educating students on online safety and empathy towards those who display predatory behavior. She emphasizes that understanding mental health can cultivate compassion among the youth, a message met with mixed reactions—some resistance from Nancy and Stanley, but support from others.

Lew's segment of the meeting conveys the gravity of the situation to the children, highlighting the real danger they faced. By the end, there's a sense of hope as the kids promise to attend safety classes, but Lew is left with lingering doubts about their vulnerability and the potential for repeat offenses.

Overall, this chapter delves into themes of maternal influence, societal privilege, and the complexity of adolescence in a world where online interactions can have dire consequences. The stakes are high for both the parents and children involved, painting a vivid picture of a community grappling with safety and accountability.

As they sit at the kitchen table, Lew recounts her granddaughter Mason's audacious attempt at a citizen's arrest with her friends, prompting a mix of pride and concern from Doc. He reminisces about his own past, revealing a man who has weathered loss and loneliness, intertwined with humor about his late wife and her objections to his passion for fishing.

The chapter delves into local history with a discussion about Grace McDonough, a woman with a troubled past, hinting at the complexities of familial relationships shaped by secrets and societal expectations. Doc shares colorful stories of Grace and her eccentric son, Noah, capturing the essence of their small-town life and the gossip that surrounds it. Amid their light banter, deeper themes of identity and legacy emerge as they ponder the implications of paternity, social stature, and reputation.

After dinner, Lew and Doc enjoy their ritual of watching the local news, a time that has grown to be cherished in their relationship. The announcement of Noah McDonough's arrest brings a moment of reflection on the recklessness of youth and the responsibility that comes with it. This news stirs contrasting feelings in Lew; while she grapples with the challenges of her own upcoming election for sheriff, she recognizes the importance of active community engagement and education in reshaping perceptions of safety.

The chapter concludes with Lew's resolve to counter the masculine image presented by her opponent, Bert Flynn, emphasizing her capabilities and achievements as the first woman police chief. With Doc's support and some lighthearted banter about crafting a campaign strategy, a blend of personal ambition and community interaction is showcased. The connection between the characters deepens as they navigate their separate but intertwined futures, revealing mutual respect and affection. Chapter 6:

In Chapter Six of "Wolf Hollow," a man wakes up before dawn, driven by a deep concern for a family of loons he has been watching over for years. He has set up trail cameras around their nest to protect them from predators like bald eagles, whose previous attacks have struck him hard, likening their loss to that of his own children. As he navigates the rough terrain towards the loons' nest, he feels the weight of his anxiety and his need for cataract surgery, which adds to his unease.

Upon arriving at the lake, he is relieved to see that both chicks are safe while one parent is absent, likely hunting for food. However, his moment of peace is shattered when he is unexpectedly attacked from behind, knocking him into the muddy waters near the nest. This violent turn leaves him unconscious and facedown in the shallow lake, dangerously close to drowning.

Meanwhile, two fishermen in a rowboat spot the man's body and quickly realize the urgency of the situation. One of them jumps into the water and

At the hospital, Lew must navigate the complicated emotions surrounding her brother's death, especially interactions with Linda, whom she finds difficult to deal with. Tensions rise as they disagree over whether an autopsy should be performed—Lew's insistence on one hints at her deep-seated need for answers, unwilling to accept what seems like a straightforward heart attack given the unusual circumstances of Pete's passing.

After a brief conversation with Bridget, she contacts Bruce, a trusted crime scene investigator, to arrange an autopsy with their new forensic pathologist, Lisa Carter. Bruce's supportive nature shines through as he expresses concern for Lew and offers to accompany her to investigate. Lew's urgency is palpable as she suspects foul play due to unexplained bruising on her brother's body, a detail that the local coroner, "old over-served Ed," dismisses without consideration.

After obtaining the names and contact details of the two fishermen who found Pete, Lew races to meet them at the lake. Her interactions with Curt Stevens and Tom Gilley reveal their quick actions saved her brother's life, and they show deep remorse for his passing. Despite her youthful appearance, Lisa exudes confidence, and Lew feels a sense of relief about having her on board for the investigation.

Once they gather in the hospital, Lisa reveals that the autopsy findings include bruises and lacerations on Lew's brother that suggest he may have fallen while fleeing something threatening—perhaps a wild animal, considering the area's wildlife. This revelation unsettles Lew, especially the mention of the possibility that he could have been protecting a loon nest, which underscores a deeper connection to nature and danger.

Chapter 10 Summary:

In Chapter Ten of "Wolf Hollow," the tension escalates as Lewellyn Ferris, a police officer, investigates the mysterious death of her brother, Pete. Upon arriving at Pete's home, she faces a cold reception from Linda, Pete's wife, who resents Lew's unannounced visit. Undeterred, Lew, along with her colleagues Ray and Bruce from the Wausau Crime Lab, checks Pete's trail camera monitors for clues. The atmosphere is thick with unresolved emotions, especially as they learn of Pete's commitment to environmental advocacy through the Committee to Save the Pelican River.

As they scan the footage, which initially reveals nothing but the normal nocturnal movements of loons, they are interrupted by Ann Mondale, a member of the committee. She expresses her grief over Pete's passing and her confusion over the cause of death, suggesting it might relate to his dedication to protecting the loons. Ann is an essential link in the investigation, and her mention of an earlier anonymous warning Pete received adds a layer of intrigue and suspicion to the narrative.

The chapter reveals more about Lew's strained relationship with Linda, who dismisses Pete's conservation work as a waste of time, highlighting the theme of familial conflict amid tragedy. Lew's investigation leads her to reconsider the ecological implications of Pete's death and the involvement of a mining company that seeks to exploit the land around the Pelican River.

Chapter 19 Summary:

In Chapter 19 of "Wolf Hollow," the atmosphere is tense as Lew Ferris arrives at the funeral home for her brother Pete's memorial service. She unexpectedly bumps into Dave, the funeral director, who is overwhelmed by the influx of mourners—far more than the four people Linda, Pete's wife, had anticipated. Lew wonders about Linda's rush to hold the service so soon after Pete's death, speculating whether it reflects her selfishness or perhaps a defensive response to the impending divorce she was unaware of.

As guests begin to arrive, Lew recalls moments shared with Pete, reflecting on his marriage to Linda, which had never made sense to her. She remembers the conversations with Pete about his dissatisfaction in the marriage and his need for a more meaningful connection that he felt with Lew, which was unparalleled with Linda. This tension sets the tone as Lew grapples with the emotional weight of the day.

The ceremony unfolds with Linda making a grand entrance, despite looking worn and forgoing mention of her husband's pending divorce. Instead, she manages to play the role of the grieving widow, which does not go unnoticed by those in attendance, including Lew, who breaks down the moment Linda mentions Pete's supposed stroke—an emotional manipulation that Lew struggles to endure.

As the service proceeds, several of Pete's friends and colleagues, including Rich, his lawyer, speak about his dedication to environmental activism, specifically his fight against a controversial mining project threatening the Pelican River. When Lew speaks, she reveals the shocking truth that Pete was murdered, shaking the room into silence. This declaration signals her determination to seek justice for her brother.

Rich Hartman takes the opportunity to detail Pete's work and the dangerous situation surrounding the proposed mine, establishing a motive for Pete's death—the resistance of powerful interests who might benefit from silencing him. The gathering concludes on a somber yet determined note as Lew and Bridget stand united, ready to carry on Pete's legacy while knowing they must find his killer.

As the chapter closes, Lew leaves the funeral home feeling a mix of grief and resolve, reminiscent of the comfort Pete provided her during their childhood tragedies. Surrounded by the blooming lilacs as spring arrives, she senses her brother's presence and resolves to uncover the truth behind his death, signaling a transformative moment in her journey.

In Chapter Twenty of "Wolf Hollow," Ray embarks on a journey to the abandoned shack where Noah McDonough's body was discovered. Despite his truck's bumpy ride on the rugged dirt road, Ray feels a strong attachment to his weathered pickup, a symbol of his past. Upon arrival, he reflects on the shack's dilapidated state, speculating how anyone could have stumbled upon such a remote and private location.

As he inspects the area, Ray considers the crime scene details relayed by Chief Ferris and Bruce Peters. He notices signs of wildlife, particularly a trail that indicates a substantial animal presence. Ray humorously addresses a chipmunk as he tracks signs that suggest someone else may have been in the vicinity—a realization intensified when he uncovers broken branches and, eventually, a golf club wedged in brush near a bog. The club has a noticeable red stain and seems important, prompting Ray to photograph the evidence meticulously.

Later, Ray visits the McDonough home where he confirms that a matching set of golf clubs is stored in the garage, linking the found club to the family. He intends to leave the investigation of this lead to the authorities, recognizing it's best handled by professionals.

In Chapter 21 of "Wolf Hollow," Lisa Carter visits Chief Lew Ferris at her office, dressed in a smart business suit but bearing a worried expression. Their conversation quickly pivots to the ongoing investigation into the deaths of Grace and Noah McDonough. Lisa shares disturbing details from her autopsies, revealing that both victims were smothered postmortem—curiously, both were also found without their underwear. This sparks a troubling theory about a possible killer who collects trophies from their victims.

Lew reflects on the implications of this theory, noting the strangeness of the scene in their small community of Loon Lake, which, despite its size, sees a substantial influx of tourists every summer. She mentions her brother's suspicious death, which may be connected to environmental activism, revealing another layer of potential danger within the community.

As the chapter unfolds, their discussion touches on the victims' backgrounds, particularly Grace's heavy drinking habits, hinting at her risky lifestyle and

Chapter 23 Summary:

In Chapter 23 of "Wolf Hollow," the atmosphere begins in a local McDonald's, where Osborne contemplates whether to order another coffee while mingling with his friends, Herm and Ray. Their typical Wednesday routine takes an exciting turn when Steve Keron, a bank officer, interrupts them with sensational news that piques everyone's curiosity.

Steve reveals that Stan Mayer, an appraiser known to them, has claimed he is the rightful heir to the McDonough trust, which consists of significant land and wealth. This shocking news sends a ripple of disbelief through the group as they grapple with the implications of such a revelation. Stan's assertion is backed by genetic proof from a clinic that shows he shares DNA with Grace McDonough, linking him to the long-ago deceased member of the McDonough family. This genetic evidence suggests that Stan can claim his inheritance despite not being mentioned in the old man's will.

Osborne remains skeptical about the legitimacy of Stan's claims, raising questions about the necessity of proof to validate family ties. However, Steve confirms that Stan is officially recognized and is looking to finalize a lucrative sale of Grace's land for a remarkable thirty-five million dollars, underscoring the potential for dramatic change in Stan's life.

The conversation among the men is lively, with humor injected about Stan's

The urgency of the situation builds as they prepare to uncover the truth behind Stan's claims, setting the stage for a deep dive into family connections and hidden histories.

This chapter enriches the narrative with themes of identity, legacy, and the unfolding drama of family ties, while also shining a light on the human desire for connection and the complexities of legal and ethical questions surrounding inheritance. Chapter 24:

In Chapter 24 of "Wolf Hollow," Lew and Doc visit the Holder Clinic to meet with Kathryn Taylor, the genetic counselor. The chapter opens with a warm reception as Kathryn expresses her excitement about the unique case they are discussing—Stanley Mayer's potential inheritance stemming from a DNA find. Right off the bat, Lew notices that Kathryn assumes they represent the bank and decides it's best not to correct her. This sets the stage for the exploration of the mysteries surrounding Stanley Mayer's DNA and newfound familial connections.

Kathryn explains how Stanley initially sought her help regarding Lynch Syndrome, a genetic marker that indicates a higher risk of colon cancer. This serious concern led him to undergo genetic testing, which ultimately revealed that he could disproportionately benefit from an unexpected inheritance left by a woman who claimed to be his biological sibling. As Kathryn narrates, Stanley had been in contact with this woman, only to receive the shocking news that she had passed away shortly before they were to meet. Chapter 34 Summary:

In Chapter 34 of "Wolf Hollow," Lew wakes up feeling overwhelmed by her campaign for office. She's not enjoying the process of running—shaking hands and sharing her life story doesn't sit well with her. Resolving never to run for president again, she looks for an escape back to her office, where a pile of investigations awaits her. However, she remembers a pressing task: choosing a headstone for her family's plot.

As she drives to the cemetery, expecting to see plain flat gravestones, Lew is taken aback by a stunning new oblong gray-granite headstone that has appeared where she intended to place her own. Her family's name, Ferris, is emblazoned on it, along with her parents' names and those of her deceased son, Chris, and her sister, Melanie. But it's the beautiful ceramic plaque of a majestic loon, capturing the essence of summer, that stops her in her tracks.

Feeling a mix of confusion and curiosity, Lew heads to the cemetery office to find out who funded the headstone. The custodian, Duane, informs her that there are no records of the buyer—just a note stating "gravedigger." At that moment, Lew realizes that it must be Ray, her friend and gravedigger, who has somehow managed to arrange this beautiful tribute despite his tight finances.

After figuring it out, Lew drives to Ray's trailer, eager to thank him. When
